the 1990s, the number of people in the world who are under 15 years of age is expected to increase by 1.5 billion (United Nations 1994).

There is a growing awareness of the need to address the needs of children in the 1990s. The United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF) has been instrumental in this regard, and has produced a series of reports on the state of the world's children (UNICEF 1990, 1991, 1992, 1993, 1994). The 1994 report, The State of the World's Children 1994, contains a chapter on children in the 1990s, which sets out a number of key issues for the future. The chapter is divided into four sections: 'The Challenge of the 1990s', 'The Role of the State', 'The Role of the Community', and 'The Role of the Family'.

The first section, 'The Challenge of the 1990s', discusses the need to address the basic needs of children, such as food, shelter, and health care. It also discusses the need to provide education and social services for children. The second section, 'The Role of the State', discusses the role of the state in providing these services. The third section, 'The Role of the Community', discusses the role of the community in providing these services. The fourth section, 'The Role of the Family', discusses the role of the family in providing these services.

The chapter concludes with a number of recommendations for the future. These include: 'The need to address the basic needs of children', 'The need to provide education and social services for children', 'The need to provide a safe and healthy environment for children', 'The need to provide a supportive family environment for children', and 'The need to provide a supportive community environment for children'.

The chapter is a valuable resource for anyone interested in the state of the world's children. It provides a comprehensive overview of the issues facing children in the 1990s, and offers a number of practical recommendations for the future.
